Consultations
with FRG

The record of our consultations with the FRG has been good on the whole until the fall of 1966, perhaps because we stood foursquare with them on the question of maintaining the MLF option under a non-proliferation treaty. Consequently, we engaged in high-level exchanges with the Germans in July 1965 prior to tabling our August 17, 1965 treaty draft. (It was in this period that we discouraged the UK from tabling a treaty draft that would have outlawed an MLF). Again in February/March 1966 there was a series of President/Chancellor letters concerning the treaty amendments we tabled on March 22, 1966.

Between these two, in September and December 1965, Chancellor Erhard visited Washington and received assurances from the Secretary of State and the President concerning our continued adherence to the concept that the MLF was compatible with non-proliferation.

Mr. Foster visited Bonn in July 1966 and talked frankly to Schroeder and von Hassel, telling them that although US policy was unchanged, he personally felt it made no sense to continue to hold out for a "hardware" solution that was becoming ever more unobtainable. He noted that the chances of changing U.S. legislation which prohibited the transfer of US nuclear weapons were remote.

Negotiations in Geneva in August 1966 with the Soviets began the unfreezing of both the Soviet and US positions. On the US side this meant giving up on the "hardware" or NATO nuclear sharing option. On October 18, 1966, the Secretary made the key tactical decision that we should submit the new language which excludes the option to the Soviets before raising it with the Germans and other NATO allies. He reasoned that it would be no use to stir up the latter until we were sure the Soviets were serious. Moreover, all formulations agreed to with the Soviets are subject to consultation with our allies, thus are not binding. At the same time he authorized Ambassador Cleveland to report to NAC that US policy is (1) non-transfer to non-nuclear countries directly or indirectly; and (2) non-relinquishment of US control over nuclear weapons. The Secretary saw this as "the heart of the matter" and reasoned that this should forewarn the Germans to the direction in which negotiations were trending.

Any charge sustainable by Kiesinger that the Germans were not adequately informed must be based on the foregoing decision. Once the new Article I was delivered to the Soviets ^{UR} on consultations with the Germans have been continuous and as complete as circumstances will allow.

In response to the Kiesinger charges I think it best to outline the decision the Secretary took in October 1966 and defend it on the basis of his rationale at that time. Unfortunately we are now victimized by our previous record of staunch and forthright support of German interests prior to last Fall.
