This is CyberScoop for Wednesday, February 20.

FOLLOWING THE MONEY: The 2016 cyberattack on the Bank of Bangladesh, in which $81 million was stolen, was allegedly carried out by a group of North Korean hackers known for digital cunning. However, a timeline released Wednesday by George Washington University's National Security Archive shows how the hackers used low-tech means to launder the money. "Given the multitude of cyber-enabled money laundering techniques available, including cryptocurrencies and online game economies ... the comparatively analogue manner in which the spoils of one of the largest cyber-heists to date was laundered is remarkable," The Archive said in a blog post. The timeline offers perhaps the most complete snapshot of the bank heist, based on court documents and threat reports.
